

REAL STATE

"The order-words or assemblages of enunciation in a given society (in short, the illocutionary) designate this instantaneous relation between statements and the incorporeal transformations or noncorporeal attributes they express. (...) Pragmatics, on the other hand, does not simply appeal to external circumstances: it brings to light variables of expression or of enunciation that are so many internal reasons for language not to close itself off. (...) Pragmatics is a politics of language.(...) True intuition is not a judgment of grammaticality but an evaluation of internal variables of enunciation in relation to the aggregate of the circumstances".

The mortgage is firstable, a figurative statement (from its Greek meaning: under the drawer) that is based on the mortgage contract. This one is made of words, symbols, numbers, and many specialized and technical terms that enriches greatly the language.

The contract has also, a number of conditions and clauses that are slogans of obedience.

Furthermore, the mortgage is also a performative statement in two ways: first, it implies an economic transaction that is not visible, defining a particular and limited landscape: the future and total ownership.

The second, as long as it hides a provocation, a tacit and silent action would mean the possibility of immediate deterritorialization.

Whenever the statement exists and it is effective, it will be contingent.
